

Keasden Wander

We start from St Matthew's Church in Keasden – where there is ample roadside parking. For those not familiar with St Matthew's, and needing help with location, the grid reference is SD 7233 6660, and the what-3-words tag is pest.flitting.bangle. If you are using satnav to get there then the address is Reebys Lane Keasden, LA2 8EU.

From the church we head left along the road as if walking toward Clapham station. Keep an eye open for a track on the right about 100m from the church and take this South for a while.

Keep going until you come to a bridge over Keasden Beck – this is Turnerford Bridge. Note though that we don't cross the beck; instead look for a smaller wooden footbridge on the left before the road bridge and take that over a minor stream and then a stile into open fields at the side of Keasden Beck.

Ahead, we see a large mound and the path climbs that diagonally – there are marker posts to help find the right route – but the path is generally quite clear. The climb is quite steep, but also short and once at the top, the going is easy, and from here we start to get great views of Ingleborough directly to our North.

We cross a couple of fields with woodland over to our right, and then arrive at a drystone wall where a stile takes us onto the roadside at Keasden Road where we see the Old School House – now a private dwelling. We turn left, and then almost immediately head right to walk in front of the old school building.

Beyond the schoolhouse we cross a cattle grid and head down the access road toward the well-tended houses at Dubsyke. Look out for a stile in the drystone wall to the left of the lane – it is well signposted. Cross the wall, and head right toward a gate clearly visible just beyond a small wooden footbridge. Generally speaking, the stream (Dub Syke) that the bridge crosses is very minor, though on the day that we walked the route it was an impressive torrent.

Once through the gate, we head east – which is diagonally across the field – to a further gate and another crossing over a much smaller beck. Once this minor stream merges with Dubsyke, the name changes to Jack Beck. After crossing the stream, we head right through a field of cows keeping well to the right to follow the fence line, until we arrive at the bottom corner of the field, where we see a track heading off to the left, and a footpath continuing on ahead. The footpath is in fact our return route for later in the walk, so for now, we head left and uphill to skirt the left hand side of a stand of trees as the track bends round to the right.

After crossing into the next field, we again stick closely to the wall, and follow the boundary round the corner to head up to a minor road - this is the extension of Reebys Lane where we started, and we are now about 1km south east of the church. It is worth glancing through the trees on the right as we walk up here – the farm on the far side raises deer, and the best view of them may often be through the trees.

Under the careful gaze of a number of curious young cattle, we head right along Reebys Lane until we get to a farm opposite a caravan park known as Lower Watson House. A humorous sign notes that there is also an Even Lower Watson House.

We head right walking in front of the houses to a clearly waymarked public right of way at the far end of the farmyard, and then head diagonally across the field where you may see (farmed) fallow deer grazing.

From the high deer proof gate at the end of the farmyard, we head slightly to the left to find a gate at the opposite corner of the field. Here we pick up a path through the farmyard of the next farm and then head right through a gate and again diagonally across a field.

Strictly speaking, the path, as indicated on the OS map crosses the opposite wall at a stile – in practice this has been blocked, and we therefore take the gate to walk through the edge of the next field, heading toward the farm at Copsy House, where we cross a beck (not very noticeable as there a sturdy stone slab bridge), before we find a dense patch of apple mint.

We now head right to a small footbridge over the beck, and then climb the embankment to enter a flat meadow below the farm at Low Birks. We head toward a gate at mid-point of the farm, and then head right up a very muddy lane. The lane soon opens out onto a flatter and cleaner field, and we now head Northwest along the left hand boundary of that field.

Our next landmark is a stile, next to this attractively weathered tree stump. From here, we head back down to the gate we came through earlier, retracing our earlier route for now, until we see Long Bank Farm. On the outbound walk you will remember that we came diagonally across this field, but for the return leg we head left along the edge of the field, passing directly in front of the farm and taking a waymarked diversion to the original path just beyond the farmhouse.

This takes us onto the farm access lane where we turn right. The lane heads gently down hill and then bears right as it crosses Dub Syke, and we soon arrive at a road junction – we are now back at Keasden Road, and we head right.

We follow Keasden Road to the North for a while, passing the stile (on the left) and the Old School House (on the right) that we saw earlier in the walk. Ahead of now we have great views of both Ingleborough, and over to the right, Pen-y-Ghent.

Further down Keasden Road we pass a private dwelling that was once a Methodist chapel, and just beyond this we look for a signed footpath on the left heading back across the common toward the church.

The signage for this route is often subject to removal - for reasons not understood – so it's easy to miss the path. If you do, don't worry, just carry on to the junction of Keasden Road and Reebys Lane then head left.

If you do find the path, follow it across the common back to the lane down to Turnerford bridge that we used earlier and when you meet that turn right to reverse the start of the walk. You will be back at the church in just a few minutes.

- Total distance 7.3 km (4.5 miles)
- Total ascent 117 m
- Easy walk